The Australian Industry Trade College came into being in 2006.

It started here:

- rethinking how to educate, prepare, and empower young people.
- questioning the status-quo and redefining success measures by celebrating the less-frequented path and by closing the gap.
- helping young people discover their purpose and fulfill their ambitions in industry.

AITC influence has been magnified since the college began providing learning and employment services and as a result, has grown significantly in both in terms of reach and impact.

"For us, it's simply about finding what fits; about loving what you do. Before opening our doors in 2006, we thought long and hard about who we needed to be and the role we could play in the education and employment landscape. We spoke to educators and to industry, and saw the options available to technically talented, bright minded young people diminish as thinking narrowed around what constitutes 'clever' and the 'best' path to success.

That was more than 15 years ago and we've come a long way since then. Like our young people, we've evolved, navigated challenges, experienced setbacks and enjoyed great successes. Much has changed, but during this time one thing has endured and that's our commitment to young people and our passion for industry."
